

One month later Rithwik shifted to Bangalore to join the company that offered him his job. It took him about two to three weeks to adjust to his work schedule. Bangalore was nothing like Mangalore, it was a very crowded city and it took more time to travel to different locations within the city. The mornings were the worst it was very difficult to reach the office through the traffic. But the night life in Bangalore was a completely different story; the city had all kinds of night clubs and pubs where you could party all night. Most of Rithwik's friends were in Bangalore so during weekends they used to meet up and spend some quality time. The city contained all kind women and Rithwik used to meet many at the clubs but none of them made him feel special. The thought of Anjana always used to stop him from crossing his limits. Even though they not used to see or speak to each other he used to see her sometimes when he closed his eyes. Anjana started concentrating more in her studies and also continued learning different classical dance forms. There was not a single day on which the thought of Rithwik would not cross her mind and that thought filled her with a positive aura.

Three years later, Anjana was sitting in the exam hall for the last time and writing her final engineering exam. She was excited not only because it was her last exam but also because the three years long wait was going to end. She was excited and happy that the magical feeling that she experienced on the day she met Rithwik